Politics...then and now...

by Lynn Brisendine

The movie 'Lincoln' is remarkable in so many ways. Sitting in the darkened theater, I found myself watching one of our great presidents fight for his emancipation amendment to the Constitution.

President Lincoln's main task was to fight the Civil War and reunite the North with the South. Recalling our history, this was the war which saw the most American casualties of any conflict we have ever fought. More than 600,000 soldiers, on both sides, fell in battles fought over a wide war front featuring many battles which took days to wind to bloody conclusions, with one side or the other claiming victory.

Driving home, we were listening to an all news channel on the radio when the reporter offered a breathless report concerning the recent petitions making the internet rounds demanding Texas' secession from the Union.

News from an internet source: "As of Wednesday afternoon, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Texas -- all states that voted for former Gov. Mitt Romney -- as well as Florida each had accumulated more than 25,000 signatures, the threshold needed to trigger an official response from the Obama administration. Collectively, the secession petitions now have more than 700,000 digital signatures."

Kind of ironic this news of people wanting to quit the union, just as this entertaining movie makes its rounds.

On the giant screen, we watch an amazing portrayal of a man most of us revere for his tenacity to continue the fight and his genius in manipulating the system to gain his ultimate goal to keep this nation whole.

This strategy has seen all of the states working together to make our nation the strongest and greatest ever on this planet.

Now comes these folks who would see that greatness dissolve into a mishmash of small governments going their separate ways in a world waiting to take advantage of any and every weakness.

While Texas could sustain a diminished economy, so many other services now supplied by the federal government would prove to be too much for a single state, even one as diverse and large as Texas. In a few words, it would be a monumental mess. One which leaves in doubt that any of the individual states could muster the wherewithal to survive in a tough world.

I suppose the knowledge that 700,000 people think this idea worthy should surprise, but in fact the notion that we have that many loose wheels walking among us is easily understood. Surely, not even these folks who, it would seem, don't think past the end of their noses, believe the petition they have signed stands a chance of approval.

The internet article continued: " Texas is in the lead with more than 99,000 (signatures), but Gov. Rick Perry said on Tuesday that he does not support secession." This from a Governor who relishes bashing the feds at every opportunity is, I think, noteworthy.

But Gov. Perry knows all too well how much money comes back to this state to fund various services and infrastructures that cutting this vital lifeline would be... well, like cutting off his nose to spite his face. Pardon the old saying.

I suppose that is enough about secession talk. Still, the movie had other points of interest worthy of comparison in our modern America.

The movie revolved around scenes in the White House and in the House of Representatives where the Emancipation 13th Amendment was argued for months. Perhaps one of the most intriguing parts of the story centered around President Lincoln and his Secretary of State William Henry Seward's use of special agents to secure enough Yea votes to pass the legislation. They offered bribes of money and political positions.

It was a concentrated lobby of paid advisors and operatives cajoling members of Congress for their vote. And, if the movie is to be believed, the tactic of twisting arms and padding palms worked.

I'm sure this wasn't the first lobby to approach elected representatives of the people. It is a working concept of politics, probably since politics began. The lobby is a powerful, well funded group, who are experts at promoting their message.

A fact that drew this comment in response to the secession report..."If the people really want to fix our government... start a petition that states (We the people of America want an end to the lobbying of our elected officials, and the bribery of hundreds of millions of dollars to their campaigns.) I bet you would get an overwhelming majority of signatures from..."

We the people, an interesting way to begin the request and one that resonates with many of us citizens out in the hinter lands far from the action.

And with this comes the interesting and hopeful actions now taking place to see "our" elected officials break from a lobbyist's pledge.

An oath or, more accurately, a pledge has been made to a lobbyist named Grover Norquist of our elected people to refuse to sign any tax increase. I counted 25 Texas officials on his list. These people were elected to serve us, not some fat cat on K Street.

Quite a stretch from Abraham Lincoln to a rich lobbyist making rules...

If you have the opportunity see 'Lincoln.'

Wright 's Words...

By Dustin Wright
Sentinel Managing Editor

This past Thursday night/Friday morning, I continued a tradition I started long ago.

Not attending a "Black Friday" -- now "Black Thursday" -- holiday sales event.

It's a streak I plan on continuing to a ripe old age.

You may ask yourself while reading this: "Well, Mr. Wright, why not?"

My response to your question would be answered by the following:

1.) I value my life. We've all heard the horror stories of rabid "Black Friday" shoppers and their quest to obtain bargain deals, even if it means tearing other shoppers' limbs off to get it. To me, there could be nothing more horrifying than a mad mommy who wants this year's hottest toy/electronic item for their child/children.

"No thanks, ma'am, you can have it."

2.) I value my time. I'm not too fond of "hanging out" (loitering in my opinion) in line for hours, upon hours, to save a couple bucks off the hottest electronic deal. After a Thanksgiving induced food coma, I'd much rather park myself on the living room floor/couch/recliner performing the typical sloth-like motions of flipping television channels or groaning at the horrible play of my beloved Dallas Cowboys.

"Black Friday" has turned out to be a huge, successful marketing scheme for retailers across the country. In fact, this year alone, over 247 million shoppers from across the United States made their way to stores this past holiday weekend, with a vast majority to shop.

I was one of the 247 million shoppers who made their way to retailers this past weekend, however, my shopping consisted of purchasing the typical household necessities that contribute to the day-to-day function of a home.

In fact, I could be counted twice in this statistic, since I forgot to get a needed household product the first time I dared to venture to the store.

I pondered even going to a retail store this weekend due to the high volume of crowds, but some how I managed to dig down and find the courage to do so.

To my surprise, I didn't run into high volumes of crowds. But I did run into what appeared to resemble swaths of what I would consider "retail collateral damage" in the two places I visited.

Picked through isle displays of "Black Friday" holiday buys. Some type of sticky substance on an isle that resembled a soft drink that had been spilled some time before. Retail associates who looked like they were coming off a full 24-hour battle in a zombie apocalypse.

And, to my surprise, there were no signs of human casualties. No handmade posters taped upon the store's isle endcaps that stated "Have you seen this person? They were last seen Thursday night at 8 p.m. inside this store."

Maybe "Black Friday" weekend wasn't all that I am making it up to be. Maybe it could be worth the time and effort to fight the crowds and loiter in line for hours upon end to save a few bucks for the holiday season's top item(s).

However, I still don't plan on ever finding out.

I've got me a consecutive absence streak to uphold, hopefully for years to come.

Board proposes budget for next biennium

AUSTIN — To pass a budget bill is the Texas Legislature's main job, but it is the 10-member Legislative Budget Board's job to propose how much money the state may spend.

At a Nov. 15 public hearing, the Board offered up a 2014-2015 two-year state budget capped at $78 billion per year, observing the constitutional spending limit. Comptroller Susan Combs has another couple of months to share her revenue forecast with the budget-writing House Appropriations Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

The 83rd Texas Legislature is scheduled to convene on Jan. 8. Among a multitude of budget considerations are: (1) a state population projected to be greater than 27 million people; (2) the business climate; (3) public health; (4) public education; (5) public safety, law enforcement and prisons; (6) roads, highways and bridges; (7) local governmental institutions, and more.

Members of the Legislative Budget Board, to whom much is entrusted, are joint chairs Lt. Gov. Dewhurst and House Speaker Joe Straus, House Appropriations Committee Chair Jim Pitts, R-Waxahachie, Senate Finance Committee Chair Tommy Williams, R-The Woodlands, House Ways and Means Committee Chair Harvey Hilderbran, R-Kerrville; and five appointees: Sens. Robert Duncan, R-Lubbock, Juan "Chuy" Hinojosa, D-McAllen, and Judith Zaffirini, D-Laredo; and Reps. Dan Branch, R-Dallas, and Sylvester Turner, D-Houston.

Remember, however: the Legislature relies on the office of the state comptroller to do the critical job of forecasting the amount of revenue that will be available to pay for it all. Comptroller Combs and crew are busy looking at tax collections, non-tax revenue, unspent funds from the current budget and the option to transfer in billions of dollars from the Economic Stabilization Fund, known widely as the Rainy Day Fund.

Five months ago, the governor and the Legislative Budget Board directed state agencies to find 5 percent in savings for fiscal 2014 and another 5 percent in savings for fiscal 2015.

Sequestration panel named

House Speaker Straus on Nov. 12 named an interim panel to recommend ways Texas can prepare for what now is commonly referred to as the "fiscal cliff" — a mix of federal tax increases and spending reductions poised to take effect at the end of the year unless Congress takes actions to avoid the cliff.

The panel, titled Interim Committee on Texas Response to Federal Sequestration, will report its findings to the speaker by Jan. 7, the day before the 2013 Texas Legislature convenes.

House members named to the panel include Rep. Linda Harper Brown, R-Irving, chair; Republican Reps. Cindy Burkett, Mesquite; Brandon Creighton, Conroe; Dan Flynn, Canton; Jodie Laubenberg, Rockwall; and Charles Perry, Lubbock; and Democratic Reps. Dawna Dukes, Austin; Craig Eiland, Galveston; Naomi Gonzalez, El Paso; and Eddie Lucio III, San Benito.

Secretary of state resigns

Texas Secretary of State Esperanza "Hope" Andrade on Nov. 20 resigned from office, effective Nov. 23.

After more than four years as the state's chief elections officer, Andrade leaves office as Texas's fourth-longest serving secretary of state. The San Antonio native previously served as chair of the Texas Transportation Commission, the agency that oversees the Texas Department of Transportation.

NTSB investigates accident

National Transportation Safety Board sent a team to Midland to investigate an accident in which a Union Pacific freight train struck a flatbed semi-trailer at a grade crossing on Nov. 15. At the time of the accident, the trailer was being used as a parade float in an event to honor veterans. Four deaths and 16 injuries were reported in the accident.

F1: impact totals to come

On Nov. 16-18, the new Circuit of the Americas Grand Prix track near Austin hosted its first Formula 1 racing event.

State and local agencies, merchants and people who live in the Austin area will be contributing information that will be used to calculate the economic impact of the event. When that calculation will be released is unknown. What is known is the number of gate receipts for the three-day event, as reported by Circuit of the Americas: total attendance, 265,499.

Secession petitions circulate

Following the election of President Barack Obama to a second term, a group has been gathering signatures in favor of Texas seceding from the United States. Soon after, a reactive petition was being circulated, attracting signatures of Texans who prefer that the state remain part of the union.

Gov. Perry, who in 2009 made a public statement suggesting that Texas might be better off on its own, distanced himself from the notion driving the pro-secession petition. Email
